Public Advocate Jumaane Williams called on Mayor Bill de Blasio Thursday to release the results of a task force’s work aimed at improving the city’s response to emergencies with mentally ill New Yorkers.

De Blasio launched the task force in April 2018, weeks after the NYPD fatally shot Saheed Vassell, a mentally ill man, in Crown Heights, Brooklyn. The results of its work were due in December, Williams said during a City Hall rally.

“This administration has to fully take responsibility of where we are right now,” he said. “We are giving a criminal response to a medical problem, and that is fundamentally what we have to change in the system.”

The de Blasio administration has made some efforts to address criticism about how it handles emergencies with the mentally ill.

The city’s mental health initiative, ThriveNYC, began deploying mobile units of officers and mental health professionals in 2016 to help people with serious mental illness — though it only served about 1,000 individuals. The city has also struggled to get two Thrive-funded diversion centers off the ground, which were built to give officers a place to drop off mentally ill people — currently, those individuals wind up in the jail system or in hospitals.

Williams said the investment in programming and changes has not come fast enough.

“We are putting everyone in a bad situation,” he said. “Unfortunately the people who are in a bad situation, and killed time and time again, have melanin in their skin.”

Advocates at the rally carried black roses with the names of 15 mentally ill individuals killed by the NYPD since June 2015 — when the city stepped up crisis intervention training for officers.

The NYPD has rolled out the training to more than 11,000 of 16,000 officers who have direct contact with the public — about one third of the entire force — and is on track to train the remaining 5,000 officers by 2021, according to City Hall.

“All police officers should be trained,” Williams said. “Even with [de Blasio’s] own metric he’s fallen short.”

Williams also called on the city to implement a new number, instead of 911, for people to call when they are worried about a loved one’s mental health.

“If you do not begin making these changes, you no longer have the moral authority” to discuss these issues, Williams said.

City Hall did not immediately respond to a request for comment on when the administration will release the results of the task force.
